The Victorian-style Union Pacific Depot was built in 1886, six years after the Union Pacific began train service to Park City. The bright yellow station cost $5000 to construct and contained a ticket office, a waiting room, a freight office, a baggage area, a warehouse and a station master's quarters upstairs. The main dining room still houses one of the scales used for weighing freight. When work was completed in October of 1886 the Park Record Newspaper applauded the results by asserting, "The building is one of the finest in Park City, the design is modern tasteful and brilliant yellow paint adorns it on all sides."

In the early 1890s, Nebraska Senator William Jennings Bryan gave a rousing speech at the Depot, advocating the retention of silver for backing the national currency after the 1893 collapse of the silver market. He leaned a ladder against the side of the depot, stood on the top rung and delivered a passionate speech to a crowd of 3,000 people, including Park City's silver miners. This was one of a series of speeches Bryan delivered across the country, building his reputation as a champion of free silver. On this populist reputation, he ran for president in 1896, 1900, and 1908.

The depot survived the devastating Park City fire of 1898 that destroyed much of the commercial district, but was badly damaged in an arson fire in 1985. It was restored to its former glory, and is now listed on the national register of historic places.

Zoom's casual atmosphere exudes a vibrant communal feeling that reflects those earlier days. Opened in 1995 by Robert Redford, the renovated railroad depot became part of the Sundance Restaurants family and was christened Zoom for the zoom lens of a camera, a fitting name as Zoom is centered at the hub of the Sundance Film Festival. Zoom's walls are adorned with photographs from the Festival and the Sundance Institute.
